1 Abstract

This poster presents, for the first time, a market model for encouraging the development of residential houses with environmentally friendly features in an urban area, which directly leads to lower energy consumption levels and conservation of non-renewable resources, such as water. The novelty of our models comes from accounting for the dynamic evolution of the eco-housing developments over the lifespan of a set policy, using mathematical techniques which have not been previously used for such models.